To help curb global warming, the city government of Mississauga, Ontario, and the Mississauga Tzu Chi School of Humanities joined hands on May 3 to plant trees in Whiteoaks Park. The school hoped to teach students the importance of environmental protection through this activity.

Led by Principal Zhuang Li-ren (莊麗仁), teachers, students, and parents arrived at the park, located near the school, at 1:30 in the afternoon.

Eugene Furgiuele of the Recreation and Parks Division explained that Whiteoaks was a revived park. Once a virgin forest, it lost its original look when many trees were cut down to accommodate incoming settlers. To help restore its original appearance, pine and oak seedlings would be planted on this day.

The city government provided 50 seedlings for the day's activity. After officials explained how to plant them, everyone set to work. Although it was raining, no one complained. Some people carried the seedlings, some dug holes, and some planted the seedlings and filled in the holes. Everyone worked hard together to get the job done.

For the students, who grew up in cities, the tree planting was a fresh, new experience. Some girls even screamed when they saw earthworms crawling in the soil.

By 2:50, all 50 trees had been planted. The principal awarded every student with a volunteers medal. The children's faces shone with delight and happiness.
